Folkes said he joined the party because of "race" and "immigration". He was a member of the party until he was expelled in April. He told the South Australian supreme court on Tuesday that the party was started by Pauline Hanson, Pauline's husband, and her supporters with a "view to the white race being taken back to its rightful position". When asked whether he knew what the party believed, Folkes said he did not. "I would say the organisation was racist in tone," he said. Folkes said Hanson did not share his views and was "a very charismatic leader", and he could tell she was never a man. "She will never make a good president of Australia." Folkes said Hanson wanted to replace Australia's constitution with "a new political order", but he did not know what this meant. The senior states' court judge, Michael Hodge, has the power to impose a sentence of three years' imprisonment or a fine for the "inciting or advising" of criminal activity or "falsely" advising a crime. The maximum sentence for inciting someone to commit murder is 14 years' imprisonment. Hanson said she was not at the court on Tuesday and she had no plans to enter a plea. She has previously pleaded not guilty to five charges in relation to the Ipswich, Queensland, election of 11 March 2016, including knowingly being an accessory after the fact to wilful damage and interference with Commonwealth election funding. 2d92ce491b
